The art of embroidery appeared later than the art of textiles. Embroidery is not purely concerned with making textiles beautiful, but rather, it is also intimately related to ritual ceremonies in which it enhances the essential solemnness of the atmosphere and environment. In Hue, the former imperial capital of Vietnam, the majority of decorations in feudal palaces as well as places of worship such as temples and shrines all enjoy the significant contributions of embroidery.

Embroidering, stitching, sewing and mending are ordinary fare for most Vietnamese women. However, in Hue, embroidery has stood out for its uniqueness and retained its professional character for a long time, especially during the Nguyen Dynasty.

The main instruments of embroiderers are the embroidery frame, needle, and thread. In the past, embroidery frames in Hue were made from well-processed wood or bamboo, which was grafted together to form a square or rectangle.
